Validating data is a typical operation that occurs at all levels of the application, from presentation to persistence. Each layer frequently implements the same validation logic, which is time-consuming and error-prone. Developers frequently incorporate validation logic straight into the domain model to reduce repetition, cluttering domain classes with validation code that is basically metadata about the class itself. For entity and method validation, Jakarta Bean Validation 3.0 specifies a metadata model and API. Annotations are the default metadata source, with the option to modify and extend the meta-data using XML. The API is independent of the application tier or programming model.
